When the sun started to go down the next evening, Cooper knocked on Tony’s front door once more. Tony answered immediately. His coat was already zipped and his backpack, filled with his baking supplies, was slung over his shoulder.

“Let’s do this,” Tony said merrily. “Where’s Rodgers.”

“Meeting us there,” Cooper replied. He let Tony lead the way to the sidewalk and slyly took out his phone to text Rodgers.

On are way. Do the right thing.

A gentle snow started to fall not long after the boys left Tony’s house. By the time they reached the fields behind Fairview Middle School, their boots crunched the snow-dusted grass. The trees of the haunted woods were dusted too, and Cooper couldn’t decide if the light snow made them look peacefully beautiful or especially creepy.

They entered the school through the always-unlocked door behind the cafeteria that Cooper had discovered as a sixth grader. Minutes later, they were inside the abandoned home economics classroom on the third floor. The classroom was made up of miniature kitchen stations used for home economics classes that hadn’t been taught at Fairview Middle for decades. Right away, Tony began to prepare his cooking station. He carefully arranged his supplies on the counter and preheated the ancient oven. He hummed a Christmas song as he found his measuring cups and began pouring flour and sugary.

As Tony worked, Cooper nervously watched the door, waiting to see Rodgers come through it. He kept his hand wrapped around his phone, hoping to feel the buzz of a text. He prepared himself to break the news to Tony. Rodgers wasn’t coming and Ultimate Holiday Baking Championship wasn’t happening.
